When did impressions become facts? You work in a law firm as a “paralegal” and don’t know the difference?

That document sets forth factual details about a lawsuit you filed. If you view what is in the document as negative toward you or your rescue efforts, I can do nothing about that. If you are proud of what happened, be proud of it. I am not sure why that document was even filed as part of the state court case but it was and is available to anyone who seeks a copy of it.

Res ipsa loquitur. The thing speaks for itself.

Thank you.

Regarding this link, you have further supported my belief that you are intent in putting others in a negative light.

Thank you for your message. I have revised my article to state the following:

Although the names of the individuals behind the APMP are not on the website or Facebook page, my impression was then, and still is now, that the APMP is essentially Allison Black Cornelius (who is the CEO of GBHS), an attorney named Angie Hubbard Ingram and members of a rescue group which was up until recently called Cavalier Rescue of Alabama (and now operates as The Cavalier Rescue). The activities of some individuals associated with what is now doing business as The Cavalier Rescue were covered in an investigative article in the Washington Post which exposed the fact that some rescuers buy dogs at auctions and have spent large sums of money to do so.

I disagree with your assessment that I have spun information to negatively affect your organization and efforts. CRA dba TCR was but a passing mention in my article about nonprofits engaging in political behavior. People can draw their own conclusions about whether or not they agree with my assessment. In the revised version of my article I do now link to the discovery document filed in the defamation case against Cathy Moon and others. The document speaks for itself and is a matter of public record.

Ms. Kavanaugh.

In the article published on your site on 8/27 article you wrote;

“The group has since changed its name to The Cavalier Rescue in the wake of an article in the Washington Post in which the rescue group was outed for going to dog auctions in Wheaton, Missouri and paying large sums of money for dogs at auction (all while claiming that Alabama is riddled with puppy mills)”

These are assumptions made by you, and not factual. Had you done your due diligence, by reading the public announcement (<https://www.facebook.com/CavalierRescueAlabama/photos/a.427813340703526/1067806066704247/?type=3>) of our dba, you would have learned following;

We have not changed our name. We simply added a dba name, which is a very common thing to do. Given our nationwide network and relationships across many states with other rescues, shelters, and veterinarians, this makes things much less confusing as we communicate on a day-to-day basis.

We were not “outed” by WaPo. For you to state such implies we are doing something illegal or immoral. We are not. We routinely share our auction activities (#auctiondogs) and have never attempted to hide this, or mislead anyone. That article was inaccurate and misled others to think we spent a lot of money which was actually spent by others, and that we spent the most most on two Cavaliers (those two $12,500 dogs were actually purchased by another Cavalier Rescue, commonly referred to as the “Rescue Trust”). In fact, The Cavalier Rescue organization don’t even exist at the time of that event.

We are quite used to people like you spinning information to negatively affect our organization and efforts. It's a real shame someone in your line of work fails to do their research before penning such inaccuracies with a negative intent.

I would appreciate it, if you would update your article to be more factual with regard to the information started about Cavalier Rescue of Alabama dba The Cavalier Rescue.

Thank you,
Lisa
